H E generous and anxious Montgomery found his impetuous friend impatiently attending his arrival. The moment he saw him he enquired eagerly for Victorine. * Have you not brought her? when shall I see her? where have you lost her? and why are you so late? were questions articulated without waiting for an answer to either. For heaven's sake, Chesterville, said Montgomery, for heaven's sake be more calm and reasonable. You know best what reasons you have for wishing to keep your attachment to this young foreigner concealed from your father and your sister; if they are very forcible, is it possible you should not consider the probability there is of its being discovered if she comes higher? I did not I did wish indeed, replied Chesterville, I did wish that my father might not know yet that...
