Excerpt: . . . would have given some considerable portion of their shares in reef and mine, to hold the position which fortune accorded to the son of old Calverly of Sydney. Even Mr. Drury, owner of four theatres, proprietor of half Collins-street and nearly all Bourkestreet, the great Drury, whose name withheld or given could float or sink a company, acknowledged that the tall, sunburnt young man was greater than he. He had settled down now. The story of his Turf success had run from mouth to mouth in Sydney and Melbourne--as it had done in London--and had furnished much material for moralising. His friends had heard of him occasionally from some returned Australian, who had met him at Rome, or Paris, or Naples. He was spending his money fast, people said. Living hard, going the pace, and so on. But he had done with it now. He had settled down. Settled down with his English wife, in his native country, and had set to work to do good in his generation. Why dont you go home, Bob Australian circles had said. If I was in your place, I wouldnt live anywhere out of Europe. Well, I think a man ought to look after his property himself j the other would say. Besides, my wife doesnt like England. And the questioner, who had heard, like all others, some version, more or less correct, of the crime which had blighted four lives, confessed that the reason was a sufficient...
